understanding of public affairs-nothing would be more ency than to maintain the Pope at Rome ! to bring Italy to respect the temporal power; to rally the essertion of M. Thoirs, that "an Italy of twenty-expects, indeed no gravitade from Italy, but he Rome should be the capital of the new Monarchy

On this subject our author appears to argue with than the New York Herald can be discovered --Pall Mall Gazetto. The Duke de Persigny has been residing at one with leisurg and money at command, at one or more periods of his life feels himself attracted towards the crowbling monuments, splendid ceremanies, and historic environs of the Panel Capital; He has spent his time not unprofitably, and hastens, after the example of this age of pen and ink to communicate to the world at large the results of his experience. He speaks, as is his wont, with perfect frankness, and developes a complete theory of the respective duties, rights. and liabilities of Italy, of Rome, of Franco, and of the Papacy, diversified with a very lively critigiom upon the speech of M. Theirs. M. de Porsigny sees no obstacle in the nature of things to a complete solution of the Roman question. He is, as will be seen, invoncable to the preservation of the temporal power of the Pope, but his frindship is of a poculiarly candid and damaging kind, and does not provent him from making on behalf of the object of his attachment the most damaging we might say; the most oresting admissions. There is he thinks in the return of things no obstacle to the volution of the Roman nucation. If there were at Rome the most comnou knowledge of human through—the most miniple understanding of public allairs mothing would be more easy than to maintain the Pope at Rome. to bring Laly to respect the temporal power, to rally the Roman people to their Government, to assure the grandeur, the eccurity, and the independence of the Holy See. How all this is to be done we shall Journ hereafter, for the writer stops short to combat the assertion of M. Thoirs, that "an Italy of twentyfor millions of people is an ovil for France. " Wa expects, indeed no gretitude from Italy, but he views her establishment as afrat-rate Power as an event accomplised just as much in the interests of France as in her own. Without Austeia ho thicks no Continental alliance can be formidable to France, and Italy annuls Austria for aggressive purposes. This is just one of those aha-trues speculations in which Continental politions. indulge with so much satisfaction—plausible, vapart, we would rather out the matter on moral than on strategical considerations, and rest the case on our abborronce of the narrow and selfish view of the relations of great corntries to each other which has found lits principal advocate in M. Thiers, and which regards the prosperity of every nation. however fairly and honourably acquired, as a direct lajury to avery other. It is a policy fi envy and enspicion, tonding directly to embrod mankind in entiless querrels and disputes and to create the very evils against which it professes to guard. Passing from this subject, M. de Peralgay proceeds to consider the question whether the interest of Italy, which he views at dentical with that of Frence, demands that Home should be the capital of the new Monnichy On this subject our author appears to arghe with score; good temper, and originality. The first impoles of regenerated Itaty, he save, was a dread of those municipal rivalries by which the country has been so long and so fatally distracted, and a desire to find in the historic name and imperial pretensions of Rome an escape from the dangers with which she felt herself menaced. A few rears of experience have, however, shown that Italy has profited by her late mistortunes, that she signed and those of Mesons, Holliday, Wise, a Co has learnt wisdom from adversity, and that there is no difficulty in inducing her to agree, andthat not rovisionally, in the cotablishment of Florence 2s HOSE Carge Premises fronting Graham Street l'er espital. Rome, as M. de Persigny truly remarks, is more cosmopolitan than Italian. The mighty me fies of the past cannot be associated with the present. Ancient Rome, as he picturesquely says, would grush modern Italy under the weight of history. All Europe -perhaps we ought to key all the civilised world-are the inheritars of encient Rome, and it is impossible to ilwarf her gigantio recollections down to the dimensions of the capital of a second, class Monarchy. Equally clear are the objections to making Rome the depital of Italy but the supposition that she is to remain the capital of the Catholic world. This almost presupposes Gibb, Livingston & Co.

the abolition of the tempural power, to which M.

de Persigny professes himself so firmly attached, en co it seems hardly possible to conceive that the Pope could occupy in temporal motters the position of one of the later Kings of the Merovingian dynasty, with the King of Italy for a Mayor of the Pulaco, It will be observed that these arguments only go to show that Rame ought not to worch house, atrable, outhouses, do de, means that it ought not to form part of it. Such. however, is the opinion of M. de Persigne, and from this phint of view he progenis to discuss the wescont state and prespects of the Poutifical Gavernment. He finds in the bosom of that Govern cent a party organized long since by the enemies
